Session description: Supply chains are complex systems with asymmetric distribution of information. The complexity intensifies when numbers of partners in a supply chain networks augment. Achieving to optimal or near optimal coordination is reached to its maximum level of difficulty when independent partners do not prefer to exchange their strategic information to other partners. The question which arises is how to coordinate the operations planning of a network of manufacturing systems with minimum level of exchange of information. To answer to this question theoretical and practical developments are necessary to study the coordination problem in manufacturing networks.

This session focuses on the problem of supply chain networks coordination with a minimum level of distribution of information and will cover all aspects of theoretical developments and practical applications, such as methodologies, techniques, studies, and experiences in this area.

Submission: Authors are requested to provide a full paper of six pages maximum written in English, in accordance with the template format of the conference. For more information, authors are requested to consult the website of the conference.

Best papers will be proposed to journals for publication as for example:

- INFOR: Information Systems and Operational Research
- La Revue Française de Gestion Industrielle
